"In making my decision, I was forced to rule against my own personal convictions," Judge Cox said.
"But the Case law on the subject forced me to hold the act valid."
"The court personally does not approve of acts of this character, but the Case law in Indiana is so positive and settled upon the right of the Legislature to do the thing which was done in this particular act, no further comment is either permissible or necessary upon the part of the court as a citizen himself."

Givan was granted ten days in which to file his appeal.
Moore's suit was based chiefly on the contention that the law was unconstitutional because the title of the law did not cover the subject matter.
